A large, crumpled, golden emergency blanket sculpture is the central focus of the image. The blanket is highly reflective and textured, with many sharp folds and creases that catch the light, creating a shimmering, almost crystalline appearance. It is set against a dark, deep blue background that has a subtle, mottled texture. The lighting is dramatic, highlighting the intricate details of the crumpled material and casting deep shadows in the folds. The overall composition is abstract and evocative, suggesting themes of survival, protection, and the human form.

A photograph of a shiny metal sun reflecting on a curved surface. The sun is a bright, circular object in the center-left, reflecting off a curved, metallic surface that creates a series of parallel, curved lines. The reflection is a bright, vertical streak of light. The background is a dark, textured surface.

The experience will be based on three presentations of self care rituals: cleaning, getting a massage and being swaddled in a blanket. The ways the body engages with the rituals restrict the agency of the body with each additional presentation. The performer begins with the meticulous cleaning of a blanket with just a lint roller. After the meditative zen garden-like lint rolling, the performer begins a hands-on cupping massage workshop that looks at the body as an object to be manipulated. Audience members can partake without having a cupping set or just watch. Finally, the experience ends with a performance between the performer and blankets in the room. Besides the examination of compliance and comfort, there are multiple cameras placed about in the room, reflecting about the posturing about excess, justified as self-care in a world where perpetuating injustice thrives on having comfort/commodities being used as a currency of success.

This is a still from a movement-based performance I created for five dancers and myself for a choreographer's showcase hosted by The Next Stage Project at Ballet Arts in New York in February 2014. It is a movement piece detailing the obsession and conformity to exercise culture. In the piece, where I run in circles around the performance space while dancers (Malin Andreasson, Sara Braun, Maayan Trabish, Koliane Rochon and Ayla Weisz) perform exercises in unison alone in a more presentational mode and come together to show tender yet messy moments of care for each other in a more genuine form of connection.
